This research refer to the overall development of core literacy framework and Chinese Curriculum Standards, for the perspective of the science literacy of the Chinese reading teaching in primary school, the primary school Chinese reading literacy (hereinafter referred to as "reading literacy") identified as core literacy: students to study in the words of the existing experience and long-term Chinese language teaching in their primary school activities, based on the reading of the text in the learning process, to use reading aloud, reading silently, reading methods, reading experience, understanding, analysis, evaluation of different types of text, to obtain the information they need to knowledge, aesthetic experience, and the goal of cultural inheritance, eventually be able to get the ability of social needs and individual development an accomplishment. and composed of a whole set of methods." This study take for the primary school reading teaching method refers to the use of the teaching materials by teachers in combination with the characteristics of primary school Chinese reading core literacy, also under the guidance of teaching principles to achieve certain reading teaching objectives, complete reading teaching content and cultivate students' reading strategies under the requirements of Chinese Curriculum Standards.

2.1 Multiple text reading

Multiple text reading means group text reading. This study take for the "group text reading" refers to the teaching of multiple text reading for a core problem in a relatively short period of time. Thereinto: a relatively short period of time, from the perspective of teaching habits, generally refers to one or two classes. The core problem is that the selected articles in group text reading class are combined together depends on the certain basis. Multiple texts: at least two texts are required for group text reading of the selected teaching texts, and there is no primary or secondary distinction between the texts. The concept of "group text reading" has a profound theoretical foundation and practical premise. These theoretical foundations are not only extracted from foreign educational philosophy, but from the reform and exploration of Chinese primary school language circles.

2.2 Whole book reading

Whole book reading can encourage students to read a complete book. Chinese Curriculum Standards also emphasize that students ought to read the whole book, and on the basis of understanding the text, multi-angle and creative reading should be advocated. "The article from textbook are often embellished, decontextualized texts with clear moral messages, which no doubt that do not help children develop literary appreciation..." As a matter of fact, the text used in several editions of Chinese textbooks in general use now is a short article with a simple structure, standard language, a single theme and a clear theme. In reading teaching, it is difficult for teachers to greatly improve students' reading ability through the explanation and interpretation of a single text. Therefore, a great number of the primary school Chinese teachers began in the usual teaching consciously encourage students to read the complete book because the whole book compared with a single text, its character more, more complex, more rich connotation of themes, the length is longer, the students' ability of attention, thinking, summary, analysis, comparison and so on are put forward the challenge, so to speak, the whole book reading type teaching mode focuses more on the cultivation of students' reading thinking.

Meanwhile, teachers need to reconstruct the existing textbooks.

As the main channel for students to know the world and receive information, reading is more like a personalized behavior formed by students in an imperceptible way than a teaching task.
